The Constructivist Metaphor: Reading, Writing, and the Making of Meaning Nancy Nelson Spivey There is much confusion regarding what is meant by constructive and constructivist. This book sorts through these confusions, traces the various positions historically, and contrasts constructivist perspectives with other major theories of discourse. It also surveys and systematizes the competing theories popular during the 1970s and 1980s about the construction and communication of meaning. While theoretical, the text makes thorough use of case studies and applications. Finally, the author presents her own constructivist research focused on acts of discourse synthesis, in which people transform texts written by others as they build their own meanings. Overall the work illustrates an integrative conception of discourse, placing cognitive activity in relation to the text whilst asuming a social orientation encompassing both composition and comprehension.
